There is nearly no downside to clinically and economically effective health management programs since each stakeholder is a beneficiary: the family, the employee, the employer, the community, and the state. These programs drive both the cost and the revenue sides of the economic equation.