

An important question – Finding the Answer

Lea Wojciechowski

When does human life begin? As a society, we cannot agree on the answer. This is an incredibly important question, and it's time to concentrate efforts on answering it. I guess 220 years ago our founding fathers didn't even think of explicitly putting a definition of "human person" into the Constitution. Who would've thought that such a thing would be needed?

The question of when human life begins is not an ethical question, nor a philosophical question, nor a religious question, nor a question of opinion. Logically speaking, there can be only ONE ANSWER. I'm tired of skirting around the issue. So much disagreement and controversy arises among people because of this question floating around society with no clear answer. It's time to come together, discuss, and pin down the one true answer to when human life begins.
